ANNAPOLIS, November s.

Charles town, October 26, 1775. A most melancholy accident happened last night near A most included by accident supposed that night near this place. The dwelling-house, kitchen, and a negro-quarter, belonging to Mrs. Key, on the place called Carpenter's Point, together with almost all her furled Carpenter and the control of the survey of the first survey were reduced to after. But, what is a peculiar minre, were reduced to antes. But, what is a peculiar manner readered the scene distrelling, was, two women who perished in the slames. Mrs. M'Alwain, a young partied lady from Frederick county, who take we days before, had come to Mrs. Key's, (with whom the lived when a girl) with an intention of lying in with her fift shild. The other was a white girl, who flept in the chamber with her, in the character of a servant The roof of the house beginning to fall in, mear to where a labouring man flept, was the first thing which where a labouring man flept, was the first thing which give the alarm. He with difficulty got down stairs and wiked Mrs. Key, who, notwithstanding the utmost danger of being buried in the slames, slew up to she camber where Mrs. M'Alwain slept, and seizing her by the hand, endeavoured to walk her; begging that the would come down, the house being all on fire. At that infant, the flames began to beat on the flair cafe, and Mrs. Key, not without being scorched, rushed down. It appears probable, that Mrs. Me Alwain never get out of her bed, although the answered Mrs. Key, and faid the was coming; as her remains were found and faid the was coming; as her remains were found the next morning in the cellar, just under where her bed stooc, and the child of which she was big, about half consumed, at a little distance from here. By what accident, or in what manner the fire a drift broke out, is at yet wholely unknown. There is some reason to believe it was done defignedly, and some of Mrs. Key's ewn negroes, are not altogether unsuspected.
